

'Attorneys' 'LLLTs'

A comparison that may help explain why Washington State's Supreme Court forged a new way forward for families with APR28 (the rule that creates LLLTs).

Attorneys represent people in negotiations, in court, at mediation, and at trial.

Attorneys can seek agreements on your behalf and write/present agreed orders in court.

Attorneys can handle larger real estate matters, ongoing business concerns, pensions in excess of certain sizes, CIRs, major Parenting Plan Mods and Contest Relocation Actions.

Attorneys set strategy, write court pleadings, propose orders and can argue on your behalf.

Attorneys can charge an arm and a leg as they leave your best skills on the table. They might (or might not) continually explain what's happening to your life in real time.

LLLTs help you represent yourself in Court and at mediation and trial, but can give legal advice, uphold civil procedures, draft legal documents and represent you in settlement negotiations.

LLLTs can represent you in negotiations within your written agreement and draft/present agreed orders in court like attorneys, just perhaps in a less threatening way.

LLLTs are more limited within family law, but suit most people's needs. We can tackle real estate matters & pensions under a certain size, but not ongoing business concerns, major mods, or contest relocations. Other limits apply.

LLLTs also set strategy, write court pleadings, propose orders and can present agreed orders.

LLLT help you bring your own strengths to the table to save you a LOTS of money while you maintain control of your case. 'Nuff said.
